My Dearest Love,

Are you well? I hope you are having a wonderful time at the University.

My heart yearns for you, my love. The distance has torn my heart in ways I could never have quite imagined. Though my demeanor may seem aloof from the oceans between us. But in the gaps of daylight when the sun burns bright, you appear, in the empty spaces the silhouette of the concrete jungle, beside a beautiful moment, I imagine you ought to be.

I carry you with me in ways you will never know, like how I have, like how I am and how I will be.

I miss you.

God, how I miss you

Yet, beneath the sorrow of your absence live something unexpectedly demure

I am so terribly happy for you.

There is a whole new life unfolding before you. There are places waiting to know your footsteps, strangers who will one day know your name, and countless versions of yourself still sleeping gaily within you, waiting for life to awaken them.

And I want you to meet every one of them.

Though, a selfish corner of my heart wishes I could keep you near, love has taught me I would watch you grow from afar than ever ask you to become smaller simply so that I may hold you closer.

So go, my love.

Go where life calls you.

Let strange cities become familiar, Let unfamiliar skies become home. Let yourself stumble, change, laugh, weep, begin again, and become someone neither you nor I could have possibly imagined.

And if, somewhere along that journey, you find yourself beneath a quiet moon wondering whether you are missed, know that somewhere beneath the very same sky, there is a heart that remembers you tenderly.

Mine.

The young man I was thought love was something to cling to, something to hold so tightly that it could never leave. But perhaps I have learned that love is not always about holding on. Perhaps sometimes, it is having the courage to loosen your hands and gently say:

Go.

Become everything you were meant to be, my love. And know that somewhere, I will be smiling for you. Always.
